1920
JULY
1920

In July of 1976, coinciding with the Nation's bicentennial celebration, the Quincy Market Building reopened at Faneuil Hall Marketplace. This would be the first of the three parallel buildings to open, and followed a public investment of $10 million leveraging more than $30 million in private investment. In August 1977, the South Market Building opened. Complementing the Quincy Market's concentration of 75,000 sq. ft. of retail space, the South Market provides 80,000 sq. ft. of retail space and 90,000 sq. ft. of office space. In late August of 1978, the North Market Building, completing the complex, opened with 60,000 sq. ft. in retail and 80,000 sq. ft. in office space.

The development of the Faneuil Hall Marketplace, with the Boston Redevelopment Authority and the Rouse Company of Columbia, Maryland the prime participants, serves as a fine illustrative example of the difficulty a Massachusetts municipality has in deriving a fair tax benefit return on its public infrastructure investment.

As has been well-documented, the State government in Massachusetts reserves for itself the use of sales, personal income, hotel occupancy and corporate income excise taxes. Municipalities are restricted to an excessive reliance on the property tax. So-called 121A agreements for payments to the City in-lieu-of taxes (for construction replacing blighted areas) have been the only viable means of attracting new development in the City in recent years, as tax liability is fixed at a negotiated percentage of gross income or gross rents. A similar incentive, called Tax Letters of Agreement, are extralegal instruments negotiated on an individual basis and with payments made directly to the City. In 1975, the BRA negotiated a 99-year lease for the Rouse Company and a Tax Letter of Agreement which provides for property tax payments at the time of project completion (July 1979) at 25 percent of gross rents.

The phenomenal "success" of the Faneuil Hall Marketplace's Quincy Building has been widely proclaimed with $300 sales per sq. ft. experienced by retailers. This success has spurred analysis of the degree of fiscal "success" the City has experienced in generating this development. This paper focuses on the differential in return to the City versus the State.

As Table 1 indicates, the State is estimated to receive annually about four times the tax benefit to the City. This future yield is estimated given the existing two-year experience of the Quincy and South Buildings and a presumption of similar effects with the North Building. Looking at the Quincy versus the North and South Buildings individually, the ratio improves for the City with the latter structures. This is primarily due to the inclusion of office space reflecting less State sales tax generation. The development issue highlighted in these figures is the financial incentive the City has (does not have) in expending public infrastructure funds to generate a tax benefit return, when the State is clearly the greater beneficiary. If the City had authority mandated by the State Legislature, to levy a sales or income tax, the success of the Rouse Company would become immediately the fiscal success of the City's development effort.

This City/State tax yield comparison underscores the City's concern that the State Legislature give careful consideration to Boston's legislative package and the tax broadening measures it contains.*
